De Corpore: Views of the Body through the History of Ideas

Second International Conference in Interdisciplinary Humanities

December 13th, 2018

The Faculty of Theology within Emanuel University of Oradea, in conjunction with the Ethics and Society Research Centre, and the Department of Historical and Constructive Theology from the University of the Free State, Bloemfontein, South Africa, organize the Second International Conference in Interdisciplinary Humanities scheduled for the 13th of December 2018. The conference committee invites researchers, academics, and university professionals in all the fields of humanistic sciences to consider a presentation on in areas such as literature, theology, literary theory, Christian theory and praxis, narrative theology and cultural history, practical theology and social politics, cultural studies and religious or non-religious ethics, modern political discourse and church history, contemporary philosophy and secular history, etc.

The agenda of the conference provides a space for relevant investigation about the complexity of the body in contemporary theoretical research and practical work, given that ideas about the body affect human beings not only relationally but also ontologically. Since over the centuries the concept of the body acquired many names and characteristics as well as begat significant confusions while also accommodating substantial distinctions, it appears that contemporary discussions about the body in the history of ideas require further reflection and concern. At the same time, the interdisciplinary nature of the debates seems to be needed for further research on the subject.

The papers presented at the conference must be related to views and ideas about the body. Relevant insides regarding in person and online presentations will be provided personally. However, please bear in mind that all papers will include: name and affiliation of the participant; a 250 word abstract, and 5 key words.
